The foundation of any successful historical construction lies in the materials you utilize. The American Revolution offers a wealth of both primary and secondary sources.

- Primary Sources: These are first-hand accounts – the raw materials of your historical construction. Think letters from soldiers, diaries of civilians, official documents like the Declaration of Independence, and even revolutionary-era pamphlets. Websites like the Library of Congress and the National Archives offer extensive digital collections. Exploring these sources allows you to witness the voices of the past, understanding the emotions and motivations of those directly involved. For example, reading letters from a Continental Army soldier allows you to appreciate the hardship of existence and the anxiety of battle.

Historians have spent generations studying the Revolution, offering diverse viewpoints and new perspectives. Biographies of key figures like George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Paine, along with scholarly papers and books, provide essential background.
